INTRODUCTION

The Center on Social Welfare Policy and Law was conceived and initiated by a group of lawyers led by Edward V. Sparer (now of the University of Pennsylvania Law School) whose concern was that constitutional rights of poor persons, welfare recipients, and other recipients of government-benefit programs were not being respected by administrators of these programs. Social workers, their supervisors, and administrators at all echelons in the state-run assistance programs, legislators who determined appropriations and other policies for these programs, elected officials who answered to an often hostile public--all were frequently guilty of arbitrary handling of programs designed to help needy persons. These abuses are viewed by some members of the legal profession as an infringement of very basic rights held by every citizen of this country--rights which most persons not in economic straits take for granted. Poor persons for various reasons are not able to assert these rights; often they are too timid to challenge what they are told by anyone who seems to represent that faceless society from which they are isolated by reason of their limited education or inherited poverty.

This concern for legal rights of the poor translated itself into the work of the Center on Social Welfare Policy and Law which was funded in its first year by the Stern Foundation of New York, and administered through Columbia University School of Social Work. The staff of the Center consisted of a Director and a Co-director, three staff attorneys, a social work analyst and supporting clerical staff. Its second year was funded partly by the Foundation and partly by a grant from the Legal Services section of the Office of Economic Opportunity to aid in the development of research in law as it interprets itself in the lives of the poor.

The Center became a vital resource for litigation being undertaken in all the States where abuses in government-benefit programs were found and where plaintiffs had come forth for class actions in test cases. Funding is now carried entirely by OEO and the staff has increased to 12 full-time attorneys, working with a Project Director and a Faculty Director from Columbia University School of Law. Fields of study which this work encompass include public housing, consumer law, welfare administration, health and Medicaid programs, public education which is wholly or partially federally-aided, discrimination in employment, and problems of the aged poor. The Center now shares this work with other research and law reform Centers funded by OEO. *

The Center maintains a unique library which includes the state and Federal manuals of public assistance administration, pamphlets and books on every aspect of the programs being studied and periodicals on both law and social work. The Library attempts to keep in touch with all printed materials having direct relevance to welfare law and how it is administered. An important part of the Library collection is a file of legal papers from welfare litigation taking place in legal services offices throughout the United States. Attorneys in these offices seek and obtain the help of Center staff in dealing with the constitutional implications of problems they encounter among their indigent clients. These papers also circulate through the services of the National Clearinghouse for Legal Services. **

 See Part IV,A, for address.

As these constitutional issues are sorted out, the concept of social welfare law testing becomes very crucial to the problems of the poor. Without dealing here in detail with the results of some of this litigation, let it be noted that there have been some far-reaching decisions, a great deal of public notice of the problems, and some noticeable shaking-up of the administrative structures. Where these structures are seen by the poor and their advocates as obstructions to justice, they can be viewed now as being more vulnerable to change, if not more responsiveness to human need, than they were previously thought to be. Threat of litigation often brings about administrative change which, while it is certainly not sweeping, is at least capable of moving toward solution of some immediate problems of the poor. Of course, it has also hardened some of the more repressive elements of a nation which can say "it serves them right for being poor" in lieu of attempting to understand the personal tragedies of people who have not been able to fit themselves into a technological society.

OTHER AREAS OF VITAL INTEREST TO THE POOR -- MATERIALS NOT INCLUDED IN THIS BIBLIOGRAPHY

Employment and Underemployment of the Poor;

Problems of Aging;

Children in Court; Delinquency; Narcotics Addiction;

Public Housing;

Landlord-Tenant Problems;

Consumer Protection and Consumer Law;

Education and Schools;

Civil Rights and Discrimination;

Urban Renewal;

Medical Assistance and Health Services

The author has restricted the bibliography to those materials having direct value in the study of welfare and legal services to welfare recipients. The fields of interest listed above are the concern of the same legal services offices and research centers as those involved in welfare litigation. It is the author's intention to limit this compilation only for the sake of brevity. Where any of these related concerns overlap into the welfare field, they are included.
